ITALY POSSESSES THRIFTY MONARCH

Victor Emmanuel Paying Off Many Old Debts

ROME, Italy, Nov. 7.—King Victor Emmanuel stands unique as the one sovereign in the world who has never had a debt. More remarkable still, he was practically free from debt as Crown Prince, when his finances were anything but florid.

The Italian civil list amounts to the very respectable sum of $1,200,000 yearly, but the King's expenses are enormous. He hands over every year $400,000 to his mother, he keeps up from eight to ten palaces and estates, which came to him from the dispossessed Italian rulers, and he is paying off the debts of an extravagant father and still more extravagant grandfather. When he came to the throne he found that there were many large debts, on which high interest was being paid, of the great Victor Emmanuel, a King in the old style, without thought where spending, women, and feasting were concerned, but a hero for courage and love of country. King Humbert was more restrained in his pleasures, but thought that a King should be a King all through, and not look at the pennies. Thus when his son came to the throne he found a sad state of financial chaos.

Victor Emmanuel's public point of view, curiously enough, is that of his subjects, that while the country is poor her sovereign should pay the personal family debts, and his private view is that a sovereign lowers his own dignity and that of his subjects if he runs into money difficulties, and is obliged to pawn his jewels, for example. He therefore looked about him for the best way of raising money and came to the conclusion that the bourgeois way is the best, that is, to cut down expenses. There was great astonishment, not only in Italy but abroad, when the young sovereign, with over $1,000,000 income, sold nearly a hundred horses which had been eating their heads off at the Quirinal Palace, only keeping those strictly necessary for royal use. At the same time two or three cooks were got rid of. Today the Queen's clothing, while still of the best quality, is not bought regardless of the price, as was the case with Queen Margherita. Furthermore, Queen Elena's gowns and hats are seen quite three times, if not more, by the public, and entertaining at the palace is restricted to two balls a year, the necessary State dinners, and such indispensable functions. Despite the household economies, foreign sovereigns who have visited the Quirinal declare that they were entertained as well, if not better, than at any other court.

Subjects Hint at Parsimony
King Victor Emmanuel's subjects do not thank him for his care of the national exchequer. Quite the contrary, they complain of what they call his "parsimony," say he is not a King, but a gentleman farmer, go so far as to call him the "miser," and hint that he is saving his money and putting it safely in English government bonds, so that the day he loses his throne he will at least have his money. This, of course, has come to his ears, but with such a man gossip makes little impression, and he has merely redoubled his efforts to get the debts paid off and live as he chooses.

Another of his "economies" was to turn the royal stables here and there into paying concerns. For instance, Castelnuovo and Castelporziano, near Ostia, on the sea, under the late "magnificent" King, were merely passive shooting places, which required large sums to keep up. The "bourgeois" King has, with modern methods, transformed them into money-making properties which pay from 3 to 5 per cent., and at the same time keeps up his game preserves at half the cost. The Colano estate, which seemed to be nothing but worthless marshes, has been drained and now pays something like 10 per cent., and the "miser" has given a large part of it as a gift for the installation of the Marconi wireless.

Queen Sells Her Old Clothing
However, with all his good qualities, it must be confessed that the Italian sovereign carries his economy somewhat too far. It is all right to pay off other people's debts, but not at the expense of decorum. It is authoritatively stated that Queen Elena sells her old clothes, that is, the very old ones—the comparatively good ones are sent to her family at Montenegro—and that her husband thinks twice before opening a bottle of champagne. It is, perhaps, unfortunate that King Victor reigns over a nation which does not particularly love and admire the domestic virtues in a ruler if not kept in the background and overshadowed by kingly show.
